General Safety Guidelines:

These recommendations are for your general understanding only and should not be used in place of expert counsel or common sense. Before beginning your study, make sure to conduct in-depth research on your scientific notion.

1. Do extensive research on the scientific topic to comprehend any risks associated with your presentations.
2. Human blood or bodily fluids, animals, live ammunition, weapons, explosives, dangerous plants, or radioactive material are all prohibited.
3. Body parts should not be put in jeopardy. Avoid looking at the sun, infrared, or UV sources directly.
4. Avoid tasting any non-food items as well as food items that may have been contaminated.
5. Put on protective attire before giving your presentation (such as gloves, eye protection, an apron, ear protection, etc.).
6. Keep quantities of hazardous materials to a minimum, and always have waste containers for the disposal of such materials.
7. Adhere to all local fire and safety laws and ordinances; exercise caution when heating any type of material; and keep a fire extinguisher on hand at all times.
8. Inspect each motor carefully to ensure that all of the components are solid and that the safety nuts are attached tightly.
9. Always confirm whether particular demonstration components call for you to acquire state and/or municipal licenses. Always get the required licenses before starting your demonstration.
10. Always run through your demonstration before you record it.
